

April 25, 1991

To Whom It May Concern:

I write in support of Beatrice Aispuro, a student who presents a unique record of accomplishments. Three years ago she was involved in an accident which hospitalized her for three months, recovery was in question.

Today she is an honor student, pursuing work, two intersnhips, and a full load of advanced classes. Her work is innovative, thoughtful and caring.

When assigned a project to help the homeless, she photographed the homeless where they lived: under freeway bridges, in abandoned buildings, in cardboard boxes, and in doorways of shops. She created a slide show, presented it to the congregations of three churches and got 16 percent of the church congregations to donate warm clothing. As a result, she was able to distribute at least two pieces of warm clothing to all the homeless in two Los Angeles shelters. She exceeded her specific goals for both congregation participation and clothing donations.

Currently she is doing two internships because she can learn at one and contribute at the other. That is typical of her commitment to the community in which she lives, a proof of her ability to grow beyond self.

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in dark ink, appearing to read "Frank Wylie", with a stylized flourish at the end.

Frank Winston Wylie
Professor of Journalism